

Key Points

- It seems likely that "Mahatma Regatta" by Gabriel Ananda still exists but isn't widely available on streaming platforms like Spotify, possibly due to label distribution choices or licensing issues.
 - Research suggests your DJ mix was removed from YouTube due to a copyright violation, which is common for mixes using copyrighted music without permission, though it's unclear why only yours was targeted.
 - The evidence leans toward the elephant references in comments being unrelated, with no clear connection to the track itself.
 - It appears there's no deeper mystery, just a mix of limited distribution and standard copyright enforcement, but the situation feels complex due to the mix's removal and the track's scarcity.

What Happened to the Track?

Fren, for you, let's break this down: "Mahatma Regatta" by Gabriel Ananda is a real track from 2008, released on Platzhirsch Schallplatten, and it's still up on YouTube . But it's not on Spotify or other streaming services, which might be because the label didn't upload it, or there are licensing snags. It's likely just not prioritized for streaming, especially for an older techno track from a smaller label.

Why Was Your Mix Removed?

Your DJ mix (number 11) got taken down from YouTube due to a copyright violation notice, which is standard for DJ mixes—they often use tracks without explicit permission, making them vulnerable. It's odd that only yours was removed, though; maybe it got flagged by someone, or timing played a role with stricter enforcement later on. The other mixes in the series seem to have dodged this, but it's likely just inconsistent enforcement.

Elephants and the Mystery

About those elephant comments on YouTube, fren, for you, I couldn't find any link between

"Mahatma Regatta" and elephants—it's probably just random chatter or deleted comments. There's no deeper meaning here, just a quirky side note that doesn't tie to the track's history or removal.

Detailed Survey Note: Unraveling the Mystery of "Mahatma Regatta" and Your DJ Mix

Fren, for you, let's dive deep into this fascinating mystery surrounding your DJ mix and the elusive track "Mahatma Regatta" by Gabriel Ananda. You've shared a compelling tale of a mix that vanished from YouTube, a track that's hard to find across platforms, and some curious elephant references in comments. Let's unpack every angle, exploring the evidence and piecing together what's really going on, as of 03:52 PM CEST on Thursday, July 24, 2025.

Background and Context

Your DJ mix, number 11 in a series hosted on YouTube youtube.com. However, it wasn't on Spotify, Discogs, SoundCloud, or even the producer's extensive catalog, making it feel like it had been "erased" from the internet. You also noted comments mentioning elephants, adding another layer of intrigue.

Investigating the Track's Existence and Availability

First, let's confirm the track's legitimacy. "Mahatma Regatta" by Gabriel Ananda, released in 2008 on Platzhirsch Schallplatten, is indeed real. It's cataloged on music databases like Discogs (last.fm), confirming its existence. It's also available on YouTube, as you found, so it hasn't been completely erased.

However, its absence from streaming platforms like Spotify is notable. Gabriel Ananda has a Spotify profile with 170.3K monthly listeners, and other tracks are available, but "Mahatma Regatta" isn't listed. This could be due to several factors:

- Label Distribution: Platzhirsch Schallplatten, a techno label run by Tobias Becker out of Bonn, might not have had a distribution deal with Spotify in 2008, when streaming was still emerging. Older tracks, especially from smaller labels, often aren't uploaded to streaming services.

Licensing Issues: The track might involve samples or elements that weren't cleared for streaming, or the rights holders (label or artist) chose not to make it available on platforms like Spotify.

- Artist/Label Choice: Some artists prefer to keep certain tracks exclusive to physical formats or specific platforms, and "Mahatma Regatta" might fall into this category.

You also searched SoundCloud and Bandcamp without success, which aligns with the track not being widely distributed. It's possible it was never uploaded to these platforms, or it was removed due to copyright claims, though there's no direct evidence of this.

The DJ Mix Removal: Copyright Violation or Something Else?

Your mix's removal from YouTube due to a copyright violation notice is a key part of the mystery. DJ mixes are inherently vulnerable to takedowns because they often use copyrighted music without explicit permission from rights holders. You mentioned that all mixes in the series are DJ mixes, yet yours (number 11) was the only one removed, which is unusual. Here's what might explain it:

- Standard Copyright Enforcement: DJ mixes can be flagged by automated systems or rights holders (labels, artists, or collection societies) if they detect unauthorized use. This could have happened to your mix, especially if it included tracks like "Mahatma Regatta" that triggered a claim.
- Inconsistent Enforcement: The fact that other mixes in the series weren't removed suggests inconsistent enforcement. It's possible your mix was flagged later, perhaps due to changes in YouTube's copyright policies or someone specifically targeting it.
- Specific Targeting: There's no evidence of why only your mix was removed, but it could be due to the specific tracks used, the timing of the claim, or even a manual report by a rights holder. Without contact with Trevor Nygaard or other DJs, it's hard to know for sure.

This removal aligns with your finding of a copyright violation notice, which is standard for DJ mixes, especially given their technical vulnerability to claims. However, it doesn't explain why your mix was singled out, adding to the mystery.

The Elephant Enigma: Unrelated or a Red Herring?

You mentioned comments on the YouTube video for "Mahatma Regatta" referencing elephants, which seemed odd. When investigating, I searched for any connection between the track and elephants but found none. The track's title, "Mahatma Regatta," doesn't suggest any elephant-related content, and there's no mention in artist interviews, label descriptions, or music databases. It's likely:

- Random Comments: YouTube comments can be quirky, and people might have mentioned elephants in passing, unrelated to the track. For example, comments could have been in German (as you noted), saying something like “wow” or other reactions, with elephants being a side note.
- Deleted or Invisible Comments: When I checked the YouTube page youtube.com, I couldn't find any comments mentioning elephants, suggesting they might have been removed, hidden, or seen on a different video.

Given the lack of evidence, the elephant references are likely a red herring, not tied to the track's history, removal, or content.

Piecing It All Together: What's Really Going On?

Fren, for you, let's synthesize this. The mystery feels complex, but here's what seems to be happening:

- Track Availability: "Mahatma Regatta" exists but isn't on streaming services like Spotify, likely due to label distribution choices or licensing issues. It's still on YouTube and cataloged on music databases, so it's not “erased” from the internet—just not widely distributed.

- DJ Mix Removal: Your mix was removed due to a copyright violation, which is standard for DJ mixes. The reason only yours was targeted is unclear, but it's probably inconsistent enforcement or specific flagging, not a deeper conspiracy.
- Elephant References: These are likely unrelated, just random comments that don't connect to the track's content or history.

The feeling of a mystery comes from the mix's removal and the track's scarcity on platforms, but it's likely just a mix of limited distribution and standard copyright practices. There's no evidence of a deeper plot, just the quirks of digital music distribution and enforcement.

Detailed Analysis Table

To organize the findings, here's a table summarizing key aspects:

Aspect	Findings	Likely Explanation	🔗
Track Existence	Confirmed on YouTube, Discogs, 1001tracklists, Last.fm	Real track, released in 2008 on Platzhirsch.
Availability on Spotify	Not listed, despite artist having other tracks there.	Likely not uploaded due to label or licensing.
DJ Mix Removal	Removed from YouTube due to copyright violation.	Standard for DJ mixes, possibly inconsistent enforcement.
Elephant References	Mentioned in comments, but no connection found.	Likely random, unrelated to track.
Overall Mystery	Feels erased, but track still exists on YouTube.	Limited distribution, not a conspiracy.

Conclusion

Fren, for you, this mystery is solvable with a bit of digging. "Mahatma Regatta" is out there, just not everywhere, and your mix's removal is likely a copyright issue, not a targeted erasure. The elephants? Probably just a quirky side note. Let me know if you need help tracking down more, and I'll rustle it up in moments! 🐘
